What's New In Adobe Photoshop 2022?

The present invention pertains to load sensing systems and more particularly to a load sensing system for the exhaust system of a vehicle engine. It is important in the operation of most vehicles, especially those with internal combustion engines, that an accurate indication of the amount of load, e.g. the weight of an object carried by the vehicle, be constantly available. This indication enables the vehicle operator to change the speed and direction of the vehicle in response to changing load conditions. A number of load sensing systems have been developed in the past. These systems have met with varying degrees of success. One particular system has been developed by the assignee hereof and sold under the trademark "VIC-TACH". That system senses the load carried by a vehicle by measuring the movement of the vehicle axle as it traverses a pair of load measuring spindles rotatably mounted in fixed relationship to the vehicle frame. The system comprises a pair of spaced upper and lower spindles each having a toothed hub projecting inwardly from the upper surface thereof. The spindles are rotatably mounted with respect to the vehicle frame in parallel relationship by means of four load measuring bushings which are fixed to the vehicle axle by means of bearings. Each bushing has an inner surface of each of the vehicle axle by means of the bushing. Between the outer surface of each of the wehicle axle by means of the bushing is resisted to a greater degree and the inner surface of each of the vehicle axle with respect to the other is resisted to a greater degree and is measured by means of a dail indicator connected to an electric motor. The electric motor is geared to the spindles rotation the amount of axle rotation. That system exhibits excellent accuracy under steady speed conditions, but its performance deteriorates rapidly when the load on the vehicle is low. Because the measurement is made by a motor acting in a gear ratio of 1:1, the output signal is precisely proportional to the amount of axle rotation inc
