print. I went to the 2nd Avenue Books meeting on the 16th of July with a friend. We were talking to the bookstore owner and the manager, and when he heard that I had been to the publisher's apartment we talked about the commission for the contract that we would be going to sign. The percentage of the revenue that we would have in relation to the price of the book. And what we should ask. Two years ago, they were changing the percentage that the publisher would take; we had asked them for 13% but they were asking us for 5%. The difficulty was that we knew that 10% was what he could spend the money from his project. They had thought they could ask for the amount that they needed to finance the project in case it was a bad project. But for me, in all my years of working in publishing, I never could understand that. I said that in the case of one title, if it was a bad project, the good thing was that we would have work to do for us. We know that the percentages tend to decrease for the worse projects, and we will have a job. The next thing that we asked about was the commission we would give the agent. They said that what was normal was the publishing companies giving 12-15%. But in the event that the agent produces good books, then he will earn from the books. We then talked about the transfer fee that they would charge us for the other books. We mentioned that we had a sale agreement with an agent. So they were going to transfer the publishing rights to him, with a special provision for a second book if we wanted it. And that was a perfect deal for them; because the agent would probably negotiate a larger percentage for his cost, and it would be worth it for them. They told us how the mid-backs were going to be released. It was good that they had changed the percentage for the first book, because otherwise there would have been less money to be divided. And then we were going to sign the contract. I was a little nervous because I had waited so long to be able to do this with them. I would have asked them to give the money for a year, so I could rest a little bit with a guaranteed job. And they gave me the money for two months. I was a little worried if I had the money to do something else. But I felt that I was going
