With these factors in mind, the Court will vacate the sentence and remand the matter for resentencing. See generally United States v. Borrash, 908 F.2d 1133, 1136-38 (8th Cir. 1990) (discussing the appropriate procedure to employ when correcting sentencing errors not raised in the district court); see also United States v. Aronja-Inda, 422 F. App'x 532, 536 (6th Cir.

2011) (vacating a sentence on plain-error review, noting that “the district court may correctly exercise [its] discretion and impose a sentence other than that suggested by the [g]uidelines in light of the ex post facto problem”). In this case, Defendant’s counsel represented to the district court, without objection, that Defendant did not know that the cocaine was in the trailer that he possessed. In fact, the record appears to show otherwise, as Defendant and his co-defendants were charged with conspiring to possess cocaine with the intent to distribute it in their home, and the co-defendants were also charged with personally possessing that cocaine. Thus, in light of this record, the district court’s relatively lenient sentence can hardly be said to be “harmless” error. See United States v. Oliver, 397 F.3d 369, 370–71 (6th Cir. 2005) (vacating a sentence on plain-error review when the district court adopted
