What's New In?

The invention relates to a molded filler neck for a fuel tank of a motor vehicle, with a bottom section, a main outlet section and a control section with a filter, wherein a coupling element is provided which interacts with the bottom section. In the case of filler necks of fuel tanks, for example for motor vehicles, typically safety regulations (e.g. in the USA under §608.13 and in Europe under ECE R1709) require a pressure relief valve in the case of a leak. A pressure relief valve must open when a certain hydraulic pressure in the fuel tank has been reached. If the pressure relief valve is not mounted, the risk exists that fuel vapors will escape into the environment, and these escape paths may lead to severe environmental pollution. In filler necks in which the pressure relief valve is to be introduced, a coupling element is generally used for the mounting of the pressure relief valve. In the known filler necks, the coupling element is typically designed as a screw, by means of which the pressure relief valve can be screwed into the filler neck as a prefabricated component. Known filler necks are generally made from two separate components, namely the bottom section and the control section, and are individually injection molded. The components must then be joined to one another using additional measures, for example weld seams, adhesive bonding or welding. In this case, additional design steps are required in order to ensure the leak-proof sealing of the filler neck at the joints between the bottom section and control section, and also between the bottom section and the filter, which usually has a housing section which is in contact with the bottom section./* * Copyright (C) 2018 Apple Inc.
