This invention relates to decorative green lighting elements, and more particularly, to a decorative green light which is capable of being used to illuminate an area, such as a door knob, and which is capable of emitting an attractive lighted color resembling that of an over-head Christmas tree, a foil-wrapped Christmas tree or the like. With the advent of the Christmas season, it has become a common practice in commercial enterprises, such as retail establishments, department stores, gas stations and the like to provide areas in and around their premises with decorative lighting for improved sales and customer motivation. Although red decorative lighting has been known in the past, green and yellow decorative lighting has not become common. Until the present invention, this was due primarily to the fact that the prior art green lighting systems were not capable of providing the attractive glittering or twinkling effect associated with orange-colored decorative lights, and in particular, those that are formed of foil-wrapped lamp wires. In the past, various attempts have been made to simulate the appearance of a Christmas tree by providing decorative lighting which has a green or orange lighting color. However, these green lights do not operate in the same way as a Christmas tree, and, therefore, fail to capture and attract the attention of the customer.
