 the city prepares to celebrate Grand Street's first year as the city's first network of bicycle lanes, most of the attention will undoubtedly be focused on the miles of green paint stenciled across the landscape. But what about the people behind it all? At the same time as those, mostly local, bicycle-lane advocates were busy, New York's Bicycling.nyc was born. Greg Eckert, the executive director, launched a new citywide web site, www.Bicycling.nyc, this week. The site offers a forum for regular riders and all constituents of the project to share their impressions, concerns and ideas. Eckert says anyone can participate, from the casual cyclist to the neighborhood president. "The idea is to gather feedback in a very organic way," he says. The site will also include the first phase of an e-mail blast in the coming months, containing updates, news and analysis. The group has begun a campaign to gather feedback from the community about its bike lanes. "We're asking people what they think is working and what they think we need to work on," says Eckert. The city is also setting up a process to listen to community concerns and incorporate them into the project. As the bike-lane
