The efficacy of the transplantation of insulin-producing human islet cells into nude mice and the influence of the portal vein and portal vein-portal vein route on islet cells grafting was investigated in this study. After the experimental groups of nude mice were given 2 or 3 x 10(4) islet cells via portal vein or portal vein-portal vein route, the grafts were monitored for 4 weeks by the reverse hemagglutination (RH) test. After 4 weeks, all nude mice transplanted with the 3 x 10(4) islet cells showed the positive grafts by RH test. However, only about 50% of mice gave positive grafts when the transplantation dose of islet cells was 2 x 10(4). The proportion of positive grafts was correlated with the number of islet cells grafted. The grafts obtained via portal vein route were larger than those of portal vein-portal vein route. Thus, it was suggested that portal vein-portal vein route was not suitable for islet cell transplantation. Gait abnormalities in the treatment of childhood idiopathic hip disorders. To compare the functional limitations and motor progress in children treated with osteotomy, capsulotomy, and modified adductor longus tenotomy for idiopathic hip disorders. A prospective follow-up study of 11 children treated with osteotomy for Legg-Calve-Perthes disease, 9 children with a developmental dysplasia of the hip (DDH), and 13 children with idiopathic hip disorders (IHD). Functional limitations were compared with the results of the general population using the Physical Functional Assessment System (PFA), a valid and reliable assessment of the performance of daily activities. Motor progress was compared with a control group of 14 healthy children by means of the Pediatric Evaluation of Disability Inventory (PEDI), a valid and reliable assessment of children's self-report. Clinical evaluation of pain in the children treated for review of the collection of DNA from people convicted of federal crimes as part of what he said was the most “proactive” review of the collection of biometric data since the 1979 National Security Act. The review will cover “any personally identifiable information – DNA or other biometric information –” collected in such cases. The review, starting in the next 60 days, will be overseen by an interagency group of privacy and civil liberties experts, including the White House Privacy and Civil Liberties Office. “We are at a moment in our history when there are new capabilities,” said Obama, who told the annual Aspen Security Forum in Colorado, “that can identify, in a non-
