Q: In Vue.js, where is the best place to make toasts of the user interactions, would it be in the store or the component? Context So I'm building an ecommerce application with Vue in the front end. The main purpose of the application is to display the products that each customer added to his cart. When a customer clicks on the cart icon, the cart is shown. Then the customer can choose some products and add them to the cart. If the customer wants to modify the cart, the "Modify cart" button is in place. While the customer is modifying the cart, a "Cart Review" button is displayed to inform the customer that they have modified the cart. When the customer is done reviewing the cart, the review button is clickable. Question Should I put the the toasts for the customer interaction on the component, the store or some other place? Like: Should the components build their own toasts when they need to inform the other components of the user interaction? For example: export default { name: 'ProductList', data() { return { ... } }, methods: { buildToasts: function() { console.log('clicked on cart'); }, buildToasts2: function() { console.log('clicked on review'); }, buildToasts3: function() { console.log('user is done reviewing

I doubt the author has any desire to verify anything, because if his "hunch" is correct he'd lose all the money he invested to finance the game and he'd get nowhere. Monday, 14 November 2017 The degree of public anger at the launch of the Ultra 4 tanker flying boat in 1929 should have convinced the powers-that-be that there really was no place for this sort of investment in the British flying boat industry. The standard biplane flying boat with a spring back tail hung around too long for me and was replaced by the new, more sporting s-shaped flying boats. These were represented on the 1929 film "R.S.S 'Stingray," with Langley's Roy von Fiebling (R.V.F.) production company supplying many of the film and sometimes flight model aircraft. I had seen many of these in the first half of the 20th century and they represented the last known construction of this type in Britain, but it was R.V.F.'s documentary techniques that have made the aircraft well remembered. This book is a history of the s-shaped flying boat that spanned its heyday between the 1920's and the late 1930's. It covers production both by the military and commercial operators, and covers the major developed and developing nations. What is interesting about the book is how much can be learned about the aircraft's origins during World War Two, from both the United States and Europe. This had great influence on the future of the aircraft which saw it re-emerge again when the Cold War came to the fore. The first batch of s-shaped flying boats built after 1945 were initially only used as airborne spotters, but they eventually took on the role of support aircraft for the defence of the United States of America. The examples here are based on three small s-shaped operators; Standard Aircraft, Catalina Inc. and the U.S. Navy and are described in detail, with especially good coverage of the UK's Light Aircraft Company which built a further 50 airplanes up to about 1956. This was the tail wheel version. Unfortunately only a few still survive. This book is primarily a technical look at the aircraft, but it also covers the role of manufacturer and spares both in large format and in the manner of a standard Who's Who book. Monday, 31 August 2017 Much has been written about the First World War and its aftermath. Most famous has been the establishment of the Royal Air Force by the British Government and the power struggle that broke out at the heart of the British establishment over what role this new organization should play. The early history has been covered by numerous authors, but one of the lesser
