Newton/REX As Donald Trump marches through Europe on his "charm offensive", he has been repeatedly mocked by British politicians. Laugh it off if you want, but this is a thing that is very real - Trump's appearance as the headliner at a lavish fundraising dinner in Manchester on Tuesday night will cost the Trump Organisation $950,000 (£735,000) - or about £100,000 per minute. No wonder he is looking to make such a splash in the UK. But there is a serious issue here. A US president has no business mixing it with British politics, let alone slating our prime minister. So why is he? The answer is simple - because the president is terrified of losing his US passport and the threat of being sent home from the USA. Image copyright Getty Images Image caption Theresa May is the latest Briton to tweet about Trump's visit Before dawn this morning the BBC was sent a leaked email from inside the White House, in which a senior aide warned of the consequences of Mr Trump losing his US passport. The adviser wrote: "I think it's essential the President keeps his passport - so it is not used as a political tool to harm the American president."

A strong argument Those of you who followed the Brexit campaign, will remember that the right-wing Vote Leave campaign fought a bitter battle to "take back control" from the "Brussels bureaucrats" and stop the EU using Brussels rules to restrict the power of elected governments. It was nothing to do with migration. It was all about our right to govern our own affairs. Brexit campaigners believed a vote to leave would empower Britain to reassert our independence. On Tuesday, that threat was removed when Theresa May secured her third great Brexit success. May has just swept to a landslide victory in the general election, and she secured a strong mandate to negotiate a new relationship with the EU. But she will have to listen to the opinion of the man who kicked off that campaign - and who helped lead the Americans in Britain

This is by far the greatest phoenix compilation to date. the 2 cd's are loaded with flac's and the online catalog is extremely extensive as well. All the bonus tracks are very well done too, either b-sides, rarities or remixes of the single's, I have to say that the remix i went out and purchased immediately was the one that stuck out the most. This guy is a real artist, in my opinion!! Highly recommended.

:D.Many communities around the world support and recognize farmers markets as places where our neighbors are able to grow their own food and connect in a traditional manner. Unfortunately, some of these markets have been caught in the cross-hairs of a larger battle between developers and preservationists. Across the United States, farmers markets and food providers have found themselves in a pitched battle with developers and landlords who have sought to bring the corporate megastores into the small-scale model of the market. A grocery store owner in the community of Oxford, Iowa partnered with a local farmer who ran a wonderful market at a local farm, allowing them to have a true community space that served the whole town. Unfortunately, they found themselves in an unwinnable battle with a developer who wanted to build their own market within a mile of their store, threatening to end the market entirely. The developer was a major manufacturer who was also a willing adopter of a user-friendly model. Their market they built was complete with coffee carts, a 'farm to table' concept, and a handicap-accessible experience. A town meeting decided that they could no longer support the market if it were not to continue to have a cohesive relationship with their store. This is a similar scenario to what a short while ago happened in Vancouver, Washington when a developer threatened to relocate a thriving farmers market and its small local provider from a downtown location to a strip mall in a nearby suburb. The developer successfully thwarted the plans for a vibrant and active market by ensuring that they did not have a bricks-and-mortar space to move their market to. The farmers market is an important part of the community and, without it, the community loses something. The battle over where to put large corporate grocery stores across the United States does not have to happen at the farmers markets. The community and the entrepreneurs working at the farmers markets have shown that there is a business model that works that does not need the support and backing of a megastore to thrive. We at The Ecology Center have been advocating for
