The semiconductor devices generally include metal lines and a dielectric material. The metal lines are located over and connected to portions of the dielectric material. In order to form the desired interconnection pattern of metal lines, a photoresist layer is patterned over the dielectric material to form masking layers. The metal lines are then etched through the patterned masking layers. After etching, the metal lines are then electrically connected to conductors formed in a subsequent stage of the semiconductor device fabrication process. It has been desirable to reduce the thickness of metal lines used in the semiconductor device in order to increase the device speed. However, problems have been encountered when the thickness of the metal lines is reduced. To alleviate these problems, nitrides, such as silicon nitride, have been deposited over the dielectric material. For example, silicon nitride may be deposited using a plasma enhanced chemical vapor deposition (PECVD) process. The silicon nitride layer acts as a barrier layer for preventing diffusion of the metal lines into the dielectric material. However, the use of silicon nitride as a barrier layer
