The aim of this study was to explore the verbal and nonverbal behavior of GPs during communication encounters about psychosocial problems. Observational data were collected in 44 communication encounters between general practitioners and patients who experienced psychosocial problems. Verbal and nonverbal communication behaviors of GPs were observed using a behavioral coding system (F(IC)ode). Four GPs were followed during communication encounters, using video recordings. The number of perceived diagnostic behaviors was much higher in encounters with depressed patients than with other patient groups. GPs communicated less with depressed patients than with other patient groups. GPs communicated significantly less with depressed patients than with other patient groups. GPs observed in the video recordings appeared more negative toward depressed patients and communicated less with them than with other patient groups. Generally, the behavior of GPs was not significantly different among patients with different personality traits or types of psychosocial problems. Compared with other patient groups, GPs had a more negative attitude toward depressed patients. The possibility that GPs provide less information about psychosocial problems in consultations with depressed patients has clinical implications for the
