In general, a fiber optic cable has a central glass or plastic core, and one or more glass fiber strands surrounding the core. The one or more glass fiber strands are protected by a buffer layer and a protective layer. The buffer layer typically comprises a resin, such as a thermoset resin or a thermoplastic resin, and the protective layer typically comprises a thermoplastic resin. In order to establish the desired core-to-core coupling, the ends of adjacent cores are butted together and the cable is then adhesively sealed. In addition, the ends of the buffer and protective layers are typically stripped of their exterior coverings, which is desirable, because no protective coverings are required when the cable is bent. While removing the coverings from the buffer and protective layers, it is essential to keep the buffer layer and/or the protective layer from pulling or skiving off of the one or more glass fibers. Moreover, it is desirable to keep the stripped area of the buffer layer and the protective layer small, since a larger stripped area makes the assembly of the connectors more difficult and expensive. The prior art describes various methods and apparatus for making fiber optic cables. One method of preparing a fiber optic cable involves wrapping and bonding a buffer layer around the glass fibers. The buffer layer is typically supplied as a tape which has been coated onto a backing. When a heat fusing process is used, the buffer layer is heated above its glass transition temperature, where the adhesive between the glass fibers and the buffer layer becomes liquid and the adhesion between the glass fibers and the buffer layer improves. The tape containing the heated and softened buffer layer is then applied to the glass fibers and bonded thereto. The result is a fiber optic cable with a buffer layer and a protective layer bonded to
