Ubuntu is already running in data centers, petabyte-scale clouds, and is about to enter public cloud space. But it doesn't yet have a way to legally permit enterprises and customers to run the OS on non-developer laptops or desktops. Ubuntu Server 16.04 LTS, the latest long-term release of the open source OS, doesn't include the Canonical Partner Programme (CAPP), which was the sole method in Ubuntu of allowing commercial users to run the OS. The CAPP system was closed down on November 1. CAPP was the only way authorized users could pay Canonical for the privilege of running the Ubuntu Server edition. It was supposed to be a simple proposition: Take a 40 percent cut of the money paid for Canonical's services and allow users to run their own servers on Ubuntu-licensed hardware. There was a caveat, and the way Canonical laid it out in the CAPP announcement was straight from the company's legal manuals. The CAPP program was intended for "end-user use only," meaning there was to be no sale or distribution of the OS by other parties. It's unclear if the CAPP program existed solely to satisfy Canonical's legal obligations as a commercial vendor of Linux-based infrastructure services. But within a few days of the CAPP program being announced in July 2014, virtualization software vSphere was disclosed to be capable of running Ubuntu Server 16.04 LTS. Copyright © 2016
