Loses in Court on Same-Sex Marriage As we've noted here before, a federal judge has found that DOMA violates the U.S. Constitution, and today, the United States government lost in a move that could have far-reaching effects. Parties in the case, named Hollingsworth v. Perry, have asked the judge to hear oral arguments on July 17. The day before oral arguments are scheduled, the judge has found that the Defense of Marriage Act is unconstitutional, and ruled that the government does not have standing to defend DOMA. Thus, no government attorneys will argue before the judge on July 17. Legal experts had believed that an appeal of the ruling would move swiftly through the court system, and the state of California was listed as the defendant in the lawsuit that started in 2010. The Obama administration and the Democratic-led Congress should have paid more attention to this case. By failing to defend DOMA in court, the Obama administration has sent a message to the rest of the nation that the federal government doesn't care about upholding the Constitution or the rights of LGBT people. The loss in court brings with it bad publicity for the Obama administration. The White House could have put a higher priority on defending DOMA while going after LGBT rights. One of the first things a gay couple does when they get married in the United States is file for federal income tax. The LGBT community has openly questioned the administration's priorities. When the Obama administration was challenged over the assault on LGBT rights during the North Carolina General Assembly's passage of the so-called "bathroom bill" in March, the White House defended the anti-LGBT law by saying that it simply reinforced marriage between a man and a woman. The Obama administration could have fought the federal court decision without submitting any briefs. But by defending DOMA before the court, the government had an opportunity to show its commitment to the LGBT community. The defense of DOMA was entrusted to William Parker, who has defended anti-LGBT politicians in the past. When the Obama administration appointed him to defend DOMA, LGBT people should have asked the White House about his views on LGBT rights. The inability of the Obama administration to uphold DOMA is another indication that the administration is on c6a93da74d
