Last year, a local health care provider in Michigan reported that one of its patients had begun paying a daily ransom on its computers. What the provider didn't know was that the hackers were now storing that information on a server in Russia. If the hackers were to see that the patient had started paying the ransom, they would go to the server and take the personal information of the patient and the other patients who had paid. When contacted, the provider's IT consultant reported that since the first notice, the ransomware had started to vanish on infected computers, and the only way to get it back was to pay the ransom. Not surprisingly, Russian cybercriminals eventually responded to the provider's pleas by offering to fix the ransomware but asking for $25,000 to do so. The provider's IT consultant explained that most people in that space didn't have that kind of money. In the case of the DNC hack, it's easy to see how this might be playing out. Russian hackers have been attacking us financially for years, but the cyberattacks never amount to anything. What if they got sloppy and one of the documents found, say, on the DNC's unclassified systems contained evidence that the officials behind the hack were Russian agents? If they really wanted to send that message, a shared identity tied to a compromised server with a known address could potentially make the hack look like the Russians do things of their own. The potential that the DNC hack was actually done at the request of Russian government agents was revealed in reports by the FBI that officials found evidence to substantiate this. 5ec8ef588b
