And who is to say that the Gmail app really does actually need to allow the code to reset the PIN when you log into your account to send email? What I would like to see is some form of detection and reaction to this but on the HIBP front it is quite easy for a service to log into the request and then submit the data to a central database and then when you supply the code it sends that off to the service and then after a time, the same thing applies. Have to say that the whole route travelled from web page to unlock is a very roundabout way to do it without it being open to attack. So, with a 6 digit PIN it is absolutely infeasible because there are only 999,999 different combinations. With an 8 character password we have 6,899,999 possible combinations. The first question is how often does it take a genuine hacker to just generate an 8 character password? A quick search didn't reveal any such app, hence the reason it is considered a service to generate a password. It's a little more complicated than that because you would first need to have guessed the password. If you are logging in to Password then there is a negligible number of things you would need to go through before guessing the PIN. As you may be able to tell, Facebook's two-factor authentication feature makes things a little more secure. It adds an additional layer of protection to your Facebook account, so users must enter your chosen code after logging into Facebook and whenever they try to access the site. It's a major security and privacy step that can help keep your account secure if you aren't always careful.
