Among the new innovations announced for Photoshop, there are features that align Photoshop with the Creative Cloud, which is a world's first membership model that allows Photoshop users to customize their desktop experience. The new stuff for 2021 has a more utilitarian approach that emphasizes easy operation of tools; it's a big focus of the 2019 and 2020 announcements, too. Adobe had good reason to bring the focus of Photoshop to the lightbulb, as social-media photography is big right now. Earlier this year, Adobe introduced a feature called Load Counters that take a snapshot of the like/dislike status of your images. To do that, you simply load a blank document and click on the "Load Counters" menu to create a new blank image. This image is what "loads counters" -- it's an arrowhead icon in the menu bar that offers a snapshot of the number of likes and dislikes in the current image stream. The SPDY integration for image formats in the new Elements, too, could improve that experience, as the KPIX-San Francisco Chronicle team told us last month. But the Batch turns out not to be Batch - the name for the new loading-chart functions on the new Elements. It's "Move Selection, Load Counters." The PDF tool now has a selection-based export feature. The AI-powered feature is meant to help remove background images, since it's isn't always clear which ones have spread out from an accidental overstep. You can also use it to restore old photographs, clean up objects and people that escaped selection, and clean up stray background elements, such as old logos and building signs. There are many uses for the tool, which can be found in the Global menu if you're using Photoshop 2019.
