Modulation of the antioxidant response of the plasma in postmenopausal women treated with anastrozole or tamoxifen.

Background The use of anastrozole and tamoxifen in postmenopausal women has been associated with increased oxidative stress and impaired antioxidant defense. Aims In the present study, we aimed to analyze whether anastrozole or tamoxifen modulates the antioxidant response of the plasma and, if so, which antioxidant marker is affected. Methods The antioxidant capacity of the plasma was determined using three methods: Total radical-trapping antioxidant parameter (TRAP), total oxidative status (TOS) and total antioxidant capacity (TAC). TRAP is a non-enzymatic method based on the assessment of the reduction potential of the samples. TOS is based on the measurement of the amount of reactive oxygen species in the plasma, which produces free hydroxyl radicals. TAC is a method based on the total antioxidant power of a sample. Results We found that both anastrozole and tamoxifen increased TRAP, TOS and TAC. The increases in TRAP and TOS were due to increases in TRAP-hydroperoxide and TOS-hydroperoxide, respectively, and the increase in TAC was due to an increase in TAC-hydroperoxide. Both anastrozole and tamoxifen were associated with an increase in TRAP, TOS and TAC, which was due to the enhanced formation of TRAP-hydroperoxide, TOS-hydroperoxide and TAC-hydroperoxide. Conclusions Anastrozole and tamoxifen increase the antioxidant response of the plasma, mainly by enhancing the TRAP-hydroperoxide and TOS-hydroperoxide levels, but the increase in TAC was
