Please refer to the book Subtitles online with creditQ: Python: closing file handles during method returns I have a class 'Loader' with method 'load_by_params' which reads a file and does some stuff with the results. Something like: def load_by_params(self, file, parameters): with open(file, 'r') as f: params = json.load(f) # do some stuff, based on the params in params return some_result As you can see I have opened the file and set it to 'r' mode. I can close the file manually as I need. But after the load_by_params method is done, I want to close the file. But when I close it, I get a RuntimeError: Cannot call close() on closed file. I have found a lot of answers to problems on SO with similar examples, but they all have methods that block or that are supposed to be ran as part of another thread. I have another class 'Job' that uses the Loader class and calls the load_by_params method within its own load method, like: def load(self): # add some code to do some DB/fileset operations loader = Loader() loader.load_by_params(files, params) How can I close the file properly, so I can use the returned result from the load_by_
