What is obvious is that Lightroom is experiencing a growth spurt under the direction of the new team. It is also clear that its learning curve is consistently improving. It is good to see a software application moving off the trail. The plethora of RAW-specific features and the speed of Lightroom make it a very worthy competitor for Nikon Capture NX2 and Adobe Lightroom 2.0. As it is, however, the price is a bit steep, especially when comparing with the most robust RAW developers out there including digiKam. To me, it's not so much useful to get a rating out of it, because I'm not going to try out the app, but I would say it is pretty cool when you can use it on an iPad. My wife has one of those USB desktop replacement iPads. I think y wouldn't get anything useful out of it, but if your friend is a Photoshop person, I think it would be pretty cool to use a iPad for it. I personally don't use Lightroom, but Lightroom also has an iPad version and I understand why it's sometimes included as an Apple Pencil option, because it allows you to use the Brush tool to draw directly on your image. I know with Adobe Camera Raw I can do that, but I wish there was something like that with iPad Pro versions of Photoshop and Lightroom. A good illustration app, like a good painting app, isn't just good for putting light and dark edges on images. It also must give you new and challenging options to play with your illustration, subtly pushing it towards greater depth of field, vibrance and saturation, etc. Adobe's Photoshop Sketch lets you do that, too.
