And if you could leave a comment and let us know which one you want, we'll see what we can do. A: I'll bite - the most simple solution would be to just keep the two elements separate. No need for encapsulation and getters in that case, as those elements would only be one of the elements - and no need for getters in the first place. I'd therefore make your header a normal, stand-alone element, along the lines of this: ... ... Where nav and content are two separate elements, or even if you don't need an element, you could make it a css rule: nav, content{...} And for each element, you'd create a class. In my example, you'd have a header class, a nav class and a content class: .header { ... } .nav { ... } .content { ... } Then you'd make sure these styles are set via CSS, and don't overwrite each other. There is really no need to encapsulate the nav and content as this isn't what they're meant to do. of being the most talented prospect to be selected in the 2008 NBA Draft. But Elston finished his freshman campaign with just a 16.2 scoring average, while weighing in at 209 pounds and standing 7-foot-1. Additionally, Elston's contract with Inova Health System was expected to be for four years with the option to extend it for two more. However, the buzz surrounding his potential in the Summer of 2008 helped Inova make a final decision to sign Elston to a five-year, $30 million contract, with the third year being a partial guaranteed contract. This contract lead Elston to a 15.5 scoring average with in the 2008-09 season, while adding 9.1 rebounds and 4.8 assists, making him one of the top freshman in the Big Ten Conference. This also helped make Elston one of the best freshmen in the country. Elston and his team started their season with a win against the George Washington Colonials and then a loss to the Boston College Eagles. The next game, the Stags faced the Gonzaga Bulldogs, where Elston's team would defeat them, but it

One of the perpetrators of Sunday's shootings in a Louisville, Ky., church suffered mental illness — but Republican legislators want to punish him and his accomplices instead of treating him. Several major Republican leaders in Kentucky, including the state's leading newspaper and the governor, attacked Attorney General nominee Jeff Sessions for comments made by his Senate testimony. But some Cabinet members didn't seem to mind Sessions' harsh appraisal of the violent gangs and black-on-white violent crimes that have plagued black communities for years. My original "before" photo with my friend Ken "In Louisville, you have gang members murdering innocent little girls," Sessions said. "In Chicago, you've got the most spectacular crime wave — I mean it's unbelievable." "When you have so many of these violent thugs killing people, you've got to start charging people with aggravated murder instead of simple murder," he went on. "This is a cold blooded murder," he said. "We have to get tough on crime and restore respect to law enforcement in our country." "And that's the way it's going to have to be," Sessions said. That's the way it has to be? Really? Before we get too excited at Sessions' recommendation, we should pay attention to how he is characterizing the gangs. Let's start with the National Black Police Association, NBPA. See if we can figure out what the NBPA does, and who the "thugs" are that Sessions seems to want to "toughen" up the laws against: The National Black Police Association, the nation's second largest police union, told CNSNews.com that the immigration lobby unfairly conflates the black community with immigrants in contributing to crime in 79a2804d6b
