Because of their unique properties, they can be used for a lot of different purposes, but one of the most popular ones is storing sensitive data. How to use it We are going to show you a few different methods of how to use a password generator. Once you figure out how to use it, you will never forget that it's there. Just take a look at this example where we use it as a replacement for the default login screen on a Windows computer. First of all, it's a good idea to have a copy of the default password and then a password that you have generated yourself, just in case. The default password and the one you generated will be stored in the following locations: C:\Users*\AppData\Local*\Passwords It's not easy to remember a large number of random passwords, but it's possible if you use a password generator to create a long list of passwords in an automated way. And since you are using a password generator, you don't have to think about the details. The most important thing to remember is that your computer's BIOS needs to be set to boot from the hard disk. Since you are using a long list of passwords, you will want to have a solid backup plan, so you are safe if your password generator gets into trouble. And most importantly, don't write down the list of your passwords anywhere, or you will be in trouble. Read this tutorial for a lot more information. Generate a Random Password List This is by far the simplest way to generate a random list of passwords. First, click on the 'Start' button and open the program. In the 'General' tab, click on 'Add' and then select 'Next'. The default name for your password list is 'Username. List' and you don't have to change this. The only other thing you need to change is the number of passwords you want to generate. You want a large number of passwords, so just enter 100 or more in the 'Count of passwords' box. Next, click on the 'Next' button. Now you need to select a folder where your new password list will be stored. So you want the list of passwords to be saved in the root of your hard disk. So just enter the root folder of your hard disk (or C:\ if you have Windows) and click on 'Next'. You need to enter a name for your list of passwords. So, enter any name you like and click on the 'Finish' button. You now need to select a name for the file where your passwords will be saved. So just enter a name and click on 'Save'.
