It can be used in .Linear optical networks rely on using optical fibers to carry data, control, and power between components of a system. In order to simplify the optical fiber network design, optical wavelength multiplexing/demultiplexing devices are used to allow data or power to be transmitted simultaneously at multiple wavelengths of light. As the number of wavelengths increases, the requirement for accurate, repeatable alignment of optical components, such as optical transmitters, receivers, and fiber optic components, becomes more critical. In order to align fiber optic components within an optical transceiver, a vision system is used to view the components. The vision system is used to precisely align the optical components such that the optical signals emitted by the transmitters are aligned with the optical signals received by the receiver. However, the visual alignment process is often complicated by the fact that the transceiver components often are electrically coupled to the transceiver by means of flexible cables. Such cables are typically of thin, light-weight construction and are not as sturdy as a rigid wire or cable. As a result, components of the transceiver such as optical transmitters, receivers and other fiber optic components often move with respect to each other. Furthermore, the cable or wire connection may cause additional inaccuracies in the alignment of optical components. For example, it is sometimes difficult to position optical transmitters and receivers
