More particularly, the invention relates to such a bumper apparatus that is articulated as a unit in a series of work stations of a manufacturing operation to minimize the number of apparatus that are required for the purpose of moving articles of manufacture through the work stations. In a manufacturing operation, it is oftentimes necessary to move one or more articles of manufacture through one or more work stations to carry out the required manufacturing functions. One of the articles of manufacture is typically presented at the manufacturing station in the form of an elongated length of material which is subject to a welding operation at the work station. The article of manufacture must also be presented at the work station in a predetermined orientation to ensure that the welding apparatus is properly positioned to carry out the desired welding operation. As a result, there may be occasions where several pieces of apparatus are required to move the article of manufacture through the work station. Heretofore, generally speaking, a transport belt was provided in the work stations in which a first or drive belt at one end of the transport belt engages the article of manufacture being advanced along the path of travel through the work station and on which are mounted a set of holding rollers that 04aeff104c
