Be it a video or an audio clip, the ability to apply a sticker to any media item has taken forever to mature. Not surprisingly, what Adobe calls the Stickers feature basically just creates a layer with some icons on the clipboard, leaving it to Photoshop to place it. Worse, Adobe now treats stickers as videos. On top of that, the stickers are produced in what we can only hope is a vector format. Speaking of vector formats, the Stickers feature also saves them as a vector file, to ensure that they do not get screwed up when you attempt to add them to another photo. What's worse, we have no way of knowing what format the original sticker was in (other than the file extension). So you can save a sticker as a JPEG fine, but if it was originally a vector format you have to then import the sticker as a vector. This madness must stop. Stickers just don't work right. What Adobe calls the Adaptive Grid view still seems like a gigantic step backward in comparison to the standard "Grid view" we have on most other image editing programs. It doesn't make much sense, but that is Adobe. Adobe has always been late to the party when it comes to DNG files. More the pity, because DNG is created to be an open standard format. However, the initial Lightroom 2 release never supported DNG-A, the highest level that DNG can claim. It is a real pity to say the least, since the "higher" DNG formats are also considerably smaller than RAW files. The 1.0 version of DNG-A in Lightroom 2 also was a bit buggy in handling certain complications, even though that did increase in later versions.
